

Fear of a Nuclear Strike

Why in news?

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee of the US has held a formal hearing recently on the question of "authority to order the use of nuclear weapons"

 $n\n$

What is the cause?

 $n\n$

\n

- The intimate fear of a nuclear strike that stalked America during the Cold War has been revived again due to some recent developments.
- North Korea is increasingly advancing its nuclear capabilities despite drawing condemnation from the world countries.
- \bullet Apart from this, the US President's remarks that North Korea would be totally destroyed increases the fear of a possible nuclear confrontation. \n

What is the concern?

 $n\n$

۱n

- The U.S. is estimated to have 7,000 nuclear warheads and the President has the sole power to authorise their use.
- \bullet Once the President takes the decision, a nuclear warhead could be heading to its target in few minutes. $\mbox{\sc h}$
- Being in charge of the 'nuclear button' is considered to be the most consequential of all presidential powers.
- And whether Donald Trump could be trusted with that responsibility is being raised.

\n

• Notably, the concentration of the nuking power in the hands of the President was conceived to eliminate the possibility of a rogue General launching a weapon without authorisation.

\n

• Now, the question is that if the Generals had the power to stop a President gone rogue.

What do the regulations say?

 $n\n$

\n

- The 2010 Nuclear Posture Review says the U.S. could consider the "use of nuclear weapons in extreme circumstances".
- This is essentially to defend its vital interests or that of its allies and partners.

۱n

 Authorisation of war falls under congressional powers, but if an attack against America is "imminent", the Commander-in-Chief has the powers to act.

\n

• But Generals can refuse to obey illegal orders.

• However, it is uncertain if a General can question the legality of the presidential directive on a nuclear strike.

\n

• The question is also with distinguishing an imminent threat.

• Some Democratic lawmakers are arguing for legislative restrictions on the power.

\n

• However, some have warned that such measures will undermine America's nuclear deterrence capability.
