

France - Protests against Fuel Tax Hike

What is the issue?

\n\n

\n

- France has been witnessing widespread protests against the proposed hike in fuel tax.

\n

- Amidst this, the French government has rolled back the planned fuel tax hike.

What is going on in France?

\n\n

\n

- French President Emmanuel Macron had swept to power on a pledge of modernising the economy and restoring popular trust in politicians.

\n

- But Macron's reforms programme could be at risk of losing the momentum.

\n

- This comes in the wake of weeks of violent countrywide protests triggered by a proposed increase in the fuel tax.

\n

- Public anger against the fuel tax has escalated into a broad-based opposition to the government's overall policies.

\n

What is the recent decision?

\n\n

\n

- Prime Minister Edouard Philippe initially said the duty hike would be deferred for six months.

\n

- But recently the government cancelled the tax proposal altogether.

\n

- It argued that a levy that was meant to induce motorists to go green was not worth the price if it undermined social cohesion.

\n

- Mr. Philippe has also suggested that the introduction of additional safety checks on cars due to take effect next year could be delayed.

\n

How does the future look?

\n\n

\n

- Welfare - The protests have shone the light on France's tax system, its rates said to be the highest in the European Union.

\n

- It has also strengthened the demand for improvements in the standard of living.

\n

- The government is committed to increasing the minimum wage from next year.

\n

- But it could now face pressure for further concessions on social welfare.

\n

- Conversely, Paris would be constrained to demonstrate compliance with EU rules that set an annual fiscal deficit target of below 3% of GDP on member-states.

\n

- Climate - A concern linked to the withdrawal of the tax increase is the rise in France's carbon emissions.

\n

- The roll back of fuel tax suggests that the government was retreating from its CO2 emissions reduction commitment.

\n

- Notably, Mr. Macron has fashioned himself as a champion of the green cause.

\n

- Moreover, his ability to regain lost ground will determine the prospects of warding off the populist threat in the 2019 European Parliament elections.
