

Jinnah - The Harbinger of Partition

What is the issue?

\n\n

\n

- The portrait of Pakistan's founder Muhammad Ali Jinnah on the wall of the Aligarh Muslim University (AMU) has created controversy.

\n

- After more than 7 decades of partition, Jinnah continues to be a controversial and polarising figure - which calls for a nuanced debate.

\n

\n\n

How did Jinnah's role complicate the Indian Nationalist landscape?

\n\n

\n

- Mainstream Idea - The mainstream Indian nationalism that started developing from the end of the 19th century was civic and territorial.

\n

- It was based on the idea that all Indians, irrespective of their language, religion and culture, were part of the single Indian nation.

\n

- At this point in time, nationalist sentiments were uneven in its spread and it did not reach all groups, communities and regions in a uniform manner.

\n

- But these initial blossoms provided the broad template for mainstream nationalism, and was pioneered by leaders like - Naoroji, and Gokhale.

\n

- Radicals - Jinnah's rise from the 1940s onward represented an emphatic and categorical denial of the idea of a single Indian nation.

\n

- He advanced the idea that Indian people were not one, but two nations (Hindu and Muslim) and propagated with conviction that both can't live together.

\n

- Jinnah's voice changed nationalism from being a territorial imagination to one based on religious affiliation - thereby provoking animosity.

\n

\n\n

Was Jinnah the first proponent of the two-nation theory?

\n\n

- \n
  - Jinnah stated his separatist project only in later 1930s, but some vague ideas of political separation had begun as early as the late 19th century.
  - \n
    - In the early 20th century, with the growth of active Hindu and Muslims communalism, these ideas began to gather momentum.
    - \n
      - In 1930, Sir Muhammad Iqbal said at the Muslim League session in Allahabad that all Muslims of North-West India could be organised into a separate polity.
      - \n
        - In 1937, V D Savarkar declared from the platform of the Hindu Mahasabha that Hindus constituted a nation in themselves.

\n\n

How did the early phase of Jinnah's politics look?

\n\n

- \n
  - Jinnah began his political career in the Congress, and was a votary of united territorial Indian nationalism.
  - \n
    - He disapproved when the Muslim League was formed in 1906, frowning at its pro-British and elitist orientation.
    - \n
      - It was only in 1913 that he joined the League, when its politics began to turn against the British (dual party membership was allowed then).
      - \n
        - It is speculated that Jinnah's joining of the league was probably on persuasion by his congress colleagues - to facilitate greater Hindu-Muslim unity.
        - \n
          - Significantly, Jinnah was instrumental in effecting a pact between the Congress and the League in 1916.
          - \n
            - Jinnah left the Congress in 1920, when the influence of Gandhi was rising and the party was moving towards a phase of mass mobilisations and protests.

- \n
- As a leader within the Muslim League he started galvanising the Muslim masses towards the nationalist cause - but things got separatist eventually.
- \n

\n\n

How did Jinnah rise as the most powerful Muslim leader?

\n\n

- \n
- Until at least 1937, Jinnah was only one among the several important Muslim leaders, many of whom were congressmen.
- \n
- In the early 1930s, there were hardly any takers for Jinnah's religious nationalism among the Muslims of Punjab, Bengal and Sind.
- \n
- After taking over the leadership of the Muslim League in 1937, Jinnah launched a powerful campaign to dub the Congress as a Hindu party.
- \n
- He preached that there was a political separation between Hindus and Muslims and that a 'Congress Raj' would mean a 'Hindu Raj'.
- \n
- He managed to sell the notion that Muslims might get discriminated against in a united India, which sowed the seeds of insecurity in the minds of Muslims.
- \n
- At the end of this coercive campaign in 1940, Jinnah had clearly managed to emerge as the most influential Muslim leader.
- \n

\n\n

What is the current relevance of Jinnah to India's polity?

\n\n

- \n
- Since the 1980s, a particularly aggressive strand of Hindu communalism has come to masquerade as "real nationalism".
- \n

\n\n

- \n
- This has debunked the inclusive and plural idea of Indian nationalism as "pseudo secularism" and propounds India as a Hindu Rashtra.
- \n

- This brand of majoritarian politics has created its own heroes and villains for the “historical wrongs” done to Indian society.
\n
- In this context of Hindu-rightist assertiveness, Jinnah emerges as the main villain, for reasons that are obvious (the other’s voice).
\n

\n\n

What are the other significant aspects in the partition binary?

\n\n

- \n
- British Pandering - The two-nation theory in no small means was aided by conscious British policy of political communalisation of Indian masses.
\n
- The granting of communal electorate in 1909 for Muslims and its extension to other groups in 1919 were clear cases of partitioning the masses.
\n
- As Muslims were grouped as separate constituencies, a clear incentive was provided for championing communally polarising issues (on both sides).
\n
- Additionally, Hindu right wing’s historical narrative of other-ing the Muslims was also proving problematic for secularists to knit a cohesive polity.
\n

\n\n

Does Jinnah alone deserve the blame for partition?

\n\n

- \n
- Some leading Indian politicians have called Jinnah a constitutionalist, mainly deriving from his speech in Pakistan’s Constituent Assembly.
\n
- But it isn’t prudent to analyse history from just 1 statement while ignoring the larger context and dynamics that drove partition.
\n
- It wouldn’t be a stretch to say that it was majorly the extremely corrosive communal campaign of Jinnah that precipitated partition.
\n
- Any intention to exonerate him and shift the blame of partition on the others like Nehru, and Vallabhai Patel would amount to distorting history.
\n

\n\n

\n\n

Source: Indian Express

\n

