- Both the civilian government and the military establishment of Myanmar (which is politically powerful), had a rough 2017.
- The issues of Threats to press freedom, Rohingya refugee crisis, and peace process with the country's armed ethnic groups got international attention.
- The civilian government of Ms.Suu Kyi's NLD, attracted severe criticism for its failure to act on these issues more effectively.
- Press Freedom At least 11 journalists of (both Myanmarese and foreigners) have been arrested in the past year on trivial charges.
- Notably, two Reuters reporters were arrested on the charges under the colonial-era "Official Secrets Act" for 'illegally acquiring information'.
- It is speculated that they were collecting documents regarding the conduct of security forces in Rakhine state, the duo could possibly get long prison terms.

\n

- Rohingya Crisis The UN has called the militaristic crackdown in Rakhine as "ethnic cleansing", and media has been blacked out in the region.
- Up until now, the gruesome horrors unleashed by the security forces are primarily coming from the Rohingya refugees who have fled to Bangladesh.
- But despite serious international condemnation, Myanmar has denied any wrongdoing and claims that its offensives are only targeted against ARSA (Rohingyan rebel militia), which is officially a terrorist outfit in Myanmar.

How is the 'Panglong Peace Conference' progressing?

\n

- Besides the Rohingyas, there are multiple armed ethnic rebels in Myanmar and Ms. Suu Kyi has been prioritising peace with them.
- \bullet Consequently, the 2^{nd} session of "Panglong Peace Conference" was convened in May 2017, to discuss on a 41 point agenda. $$
- Positives This brought together the government, military and ethnic rebel leaders and agreement was reached on 37 issues. \n
- The rebel groups agreed to recognize a democracy union with federalist polity that gives considerable rights for ethnic self-determination.
- On its part, the government agreed to treat all ethnicities equally and privileged the provinces to write their own sub-constitutions within Myanmar.

\n

- Challenges However, the calls for dissolution of rebel armies to pave the way for the constitution of a single national army haven't been agreed.
- Contrarily, the rebels vouch for a federal army to enable them retain independent command structures.
- \bullet Also, there have been some hiccups with the technicality of whether to specifically iterate the clause for "non-secession" in the peace accord. $$
- Also, another major concern is that out of the more than 20 armed groups, only 8 have signed the current "Nationwide Ceasefire Agreement" thus far.
- \bullet While the $3^{\rm rd}$ round of the Panglong Conference has been scheduled for late January, the future looks uncertain. $\mbox{\sc has}$
