

Reduced PF Contribution for Women Employees

What is the issue?

\n\n

\n

- The Budget proposal to reduce the provident fund (PF) contribution of women employees is a welcome move.

\n

- But the real need is addressing the employer's concerns in hiring women employees, to bring in gender balance in workplace.

\n

What is the budget proposal?

\n\n

\n

- The Budget proposes to reduce the provident fund (PF) contribution of women employees to 8% from the standard 12%.

\n

- This will be for the first three years.

\n

- The move comes without any change in the employer's contribution.

\n

- In general, both the employer and the employee pay an equal contribution towards provident fund.

\n

\n\n

What are the shortfalls in the approach?

\n\n

\n

- As stated in the Budget speech, PF relief is targeted at improving women's participation in the workforce.

\n

- However, the reasons for the steady fall in female workforce participation rates are varied.

\n

- So, how far will the move appreciably effect gender balance in workplace is uncertain.

\n

- Workplace - Absence of a conducive workplace environment for women is a major reason for low participation.

\n

- This ranges from providing the infrastructural facilities to protection from sexual harassment.

\n

- This prime issue is little to be addressed by PF contribution.

\n

- Maternity leave - Government recently expanded the provision for paid maternity leave from 12 weeks to 26 weeks.

\n

- It also mandated the provision of crèche facilities in firms employing 50 or more employees.

\n

- Multinational IT subsidiaries offer these facilities.

\n

- State-owned entities also follow the mandates as they have the wherewithal to sustain such costs and are bound to follow the law.

\n

- However, for many Indian companies, costs of meeting out these regulations may be burdensome.

\n

- This acts as strong disincentive for hiring more women.

\n

- MSME - This is particularly true with the medium and small scale (MSME) sectors.

\n

- MSMEs remain the critical employment generators in India.

\n

- Notably, many remain outside the formal employment arena.

\n

- Embedding the incentive only in the organised sector would thus produce only a little change.

\n

- As, this account only for a minuscule proportion of employment in India.

\n

\n\n

What should be done?

\n\n

\n

- Incentivising women to join the workforce addresses only a part of the problem.

\n

- When it comes to gender balance in the workplace, the issue at stake is about incentivising companies.

\n

- This is essential in the first place to encourage them to hire more women.

\n

- The monetary and non-monetary costs on companies for the payment of maternity and childcare benefits must be recognised.

\n

- The government can thus consider offering subsidies to minimise this burden.

\n

- Offering tax breaks for the companies on maternity benefits and expenditure on crèche facilities is also another viable option.
