

SC Decision on Rohingyas Deportation

What is the issue?

\n\n

\n

- Seven Rohingya men were recently deported to Myanmar for being "illegal immigrants".

\n

- The Supreme Court dismissed an application to restrain the government from taking steps for deportation.

\n

\n\n

What is the deportation case?

\n\n

\n

- The men had entered Assam in 2012 without documentation and were prosecuted for illegal entry under the Foreigners Act.

\n

- A case challenging the government's move to carry out en masse deportation of Rohingya refugees is still pending before the Supreme Court.

\n

- Given this, the deportation of seven Rohingya men was unexpected and contentious.

\n

- The government says that the detainees had consented to return and the Myanmar Embassy had confirmed they were "citizens".

\n

- An intervention application was filed before the SC, seeking a stay order.

\n

- The petition says the detainees were "refugees" as they were at the risk of persecution.

\n

- But the matter was dismissed by the Bench noting that they were "illegal immigrants".

\n

\n\n

Why is the court's decision disputable?

\n\n

\n

- Constitution - In NHRC v. State of Arunachal, the Court extended protection under Article 14 and 21 to refugees.

\n

- Given the circumstances, refugees often cross borders without prior planning or valid documentation.

\n

- If not for anything, this should reinforce their status as “refugees” and not “illegal immigrants”.

\n

- Here, evidently, the Rohingya deported to Myanmar are at the risk of being tortured, indefinitely detained and even killed.

\n

- International law - Further, various high courts have upheld the customary international law principle of non-refoulement.

\n

- It is the practice of not forcing refugees or asylum seekers to return to a country in which they are liable to be subjected to persecution.

\n

- In view of these principles, the deportation potentially violates Article 21, and India’s international obligations.

\n

- Citizens - The argument that the men are “citizens” and therefore not in need of protection is without legal basis.

\n

- Refugees frequently, though not always, are citizens of the state they are fleeing from.

\n

- Government's claim that the men have been accepted as “citizens” by Myanmar is disputable as the root of the plight of the Rohingya is the denial of citizenship.

\n

- In Myanmar, they are being issued the controversial National Verification Card.

\n

- This does not recognise their religion or ethnicity and definitely does not confer citizenship.

\n

- Judiciary - In the absence of a domestic refugee protection law, it is for the judiciary to extend minimum constitutional protection to refugees.

\n

- By allowing this deportation, the SC has set a new precedent that is contrary to India's core constitutional tenets.
\n
- However, it is important to not overstate the implications, as the order was based on the notion that the men had consented to return.
\n
- So in cases where there is no consent, this cannot apply as a precedent.
