

Question : The central bank should remain the regulator for the government securities market. Do you agree with this view? Comment.

Recently, SEBI has raised concern over the low bond yields and demanded transfer of control of bond market to SEBI from RBI.

While the ^{low} bond yields is a valid point to contest, a low bond yield is highly essential in the post covid period to keep the cost of government borrowing low. Thus RBI has done a good job in this regard.

Various other factors that support the bond market control by RBI are:

- ① The investor population of SEBI and bond market are two different arenas. While SEBI's (stock market) investors are highly low wealth investors. The investors in bond market are usually by high-wealth players.
- ② RBI has extensive control of the economy of India. They can be able to fix the repo, reverse repo etc.. in order to keep the inflation and deflation at check.

③ For various activities and powers that RBI exercise to keep the economy in check, have a major co-relation with the checks that are mandatory for regulation for bond markets. If SEBI is allotted to control the bond markets, it may require additional manpower to control the bond markets.

⑤ The RBI can one way or the other can be able to control the bond yield from falling too steep by adjusting various factors like monetary policy etc., SEBI may not be able to perform it.

Thus, the market bond market watchdog should be the RBI atleast for now, until the economy recovers to the pre-covid levels.
